

FLAT DISCOVERED TO BE IN A SHOCKING STATE AFTER NEIGHBOURS NOTICE A LINGERING STENCH

A flat in South East London has been discovered in a repulsive and shocking state after the landlord received complaints of a smell rising through the block.

As neighbours tolerated a developing bad smell in the block, they had no idea what they were living on top of. A man and woman had begun renting the basement flat when the smell began to get worse. Of course, they did not want to also live in the smell, so after conversing, over a period of a few months, with the landlord, they left after almost a year. Upon the landlord's arrival, in October, he was greeted with a shameless and vile mess of a property.

The flat was left with dirty mattresses, bird's nests, and shockingly, a large, rotting piece of meat hanging up! It is horrific to believe that people could live so comfortably in such an environment.

After speaking with another resident of the block, it's clear that this wasn't only heinous to the landlord. "It was horrible to see that they had lived in such a state!" says a fellow resident.

Why did they live in such a way? Is that what they would consider normal? Only they will know why they chose to live the way they did. But now they're gone, the landlord can restore the property to its once squeaky, clean status. As well as this the other residents can now look forward to saying good riddance to the terrible odour!
